A Wave of Innovation Is Moving to the Edge of Computing Most semiconductor and device companies are already seeing benefits from the early adoption of edge computing and IoT. At MWC, analysts and investors will focus heavily on how the next wave of the Internet of Things creates new opportunities for mobile network operators, device manufacturers, and service providers. Amidst the deluge of IoT-related announcements, mobile operators have already begun deploying the Internet of Things. Mobile operators and service providers have found the Internet of Things to be more than just a buzzword. The IOT space presents opportunities for operators with real monetization potential, and service providers that can service these customers. In contrast, the original promise of IoT/IoE has been met with disappointment — particularly in the consumption of energy — because there is little volume or data to feed into the network. But, according to the MWC Mobile Phone and Network Services event, this is about to change. The new crop of mobile edge computing devices and IoT sensors, available from multiple vendors, promise to increase the volume and velocity of IoT data produced and collected by Internet-enabled devices. These edge computing devices have the potential to serve as living-room sensors to detect and track visitors, deliver information and advertising, monitor air quality, and deliver location-based services. Finally, edge computing devices can reduce time-consuming and energy-intensive data collection and analysis, which is highly relevant to the energy sector. As vendors catch up with the growing number of edge computing devices and IoT sensors hitting the market, the combination of these technologies has the potential to create some amazing applications. For mobile operators, IoT data can create opportunities to monetize the network and the network's location services by gaining analytics and location-based services. For mobile service providers, IoT data can create opportunities to transform the communications market and create a new set of revenues and services. IoT, cloud-based and running on edge computing devices, is expected to be a big driver of new services, revenue, and device shipments. But there is still a lot of ground to cover, especially for the first phase of edge computing devices that are not yet available on the market. New Edge Computing Devices, Services, and Platforms There are a number of OEMs and mobile device and M2M players that are releasing new edge computing devices, services, and platforms that are being used to drive the demand for the devices. The first wave of edge computing devices is expected to Receive the latest entertainment-news updates in your inbox A new study from the Pew Research Center estimates that only about a third of Americans — including younger Americans — say they plan to have "very generous" or "generous" life goals when they grow up. According to the study, on average, Americans view their lives as being going well or very well, with more than seven in 10 Americans saying their life is going "very well" or "well." Americans who are getting married for the first time put off settling down, however. "Americans with the youngest children, the youngest adults are less likely to have a goal of raising a family," sociologist Sara Laschever said. Among those who are getting married, there is a "trend towards delaying the big wedding," sociologist Regina LaFlamme said. "There's a trend towards buying your own home, rather than renting," LaFlamme said, "and homeownership is more of an investment, a financial investment." Those who are childless are the most optimistic about having children, the study showed. People who have never had a child believe they will have one about nine years from now, according to the survey. But first, they're planning to have more fun. "We want to do more entertaining," as well as "travel," according to Gen Xers. They also plan to travel more domestically, while Baby Boomers said they'd be more likely to "explore the world," according to Pew. One of the first things any accomplished coach will tell you about teams is that there's really only one or two pieces that define a winning team, and that it can't really be a spread team without a strong quarterback. The Miami Hurricanes, Alabama Crimson Tide and Michigan State Spartans are all good examples. I'm sure you can come up with a few more examples, so let's take a look at a few more random teams you probably never thought of that fit this bill. North Carolina Tar Heels Despite a 6-6 record and an ACC Coastal division win, Carolina's season really ended the week of the New Mexico State game. When you're in the discussion as a Top 25 team, wins against your rivals are all you're really expected to
